Resurrection Life is a rapidly growing church in Grandville, Michigan. With weekend attendance of about 8,000 people, the church walls had to expand as well. Acoustic Dimensions was brought onto the design team by Holland Simpson, the broadcast consultant, to provide audio, acoustics and video projection design. Music is vital to the worship service, in addition, the church incorporates visual artists and dance into their services.

One of the driving factors of the level of the sound system wasn't merely the $1 million budget, but more the quality of the musicians and technical team themselves. The team at Resurrection Life operate at a professional level and required that type of a system. In many ways, the system is more like a touring setup. The platform has a lot of multi-conductor snakes, stage boxes, and things that road shows use. The system enables set up of multiple bands without unpatching or disconnecting anything. Ken Reynolds, the director of Worship and Creative arts remarked that when the debut weekend was over, people commented on how "crystal clear" everything sounded. "It's like they could hear everything, every little detail," he said.
